1	Nature of the tasks:  Who we are:  We are a highly motivated team of around 15 professionals including economists, lawyers, natural scientists and engineers working in the political spotlight. Tackling climate change is our core business. We work on climate financing and issues related to deforestation and land use, both in the international climate negotiations and within the EU. Accordingly, the team in CLIMA.A.2 spearheads the development of EU and international solutions for mobilising climate finance. We also work on the development of EU and international emission reduction policies related to agriculture and forestry. Furthermore, our Unit represents the Commission in the international climate negotiations on Land Use and Land Use Change and Forestry (LULUCF) and on reducing emissions from deforestation and forest degradation in the tropics (REDD+). Our unit has taken the lead in transposing the Durban decision on LULUCF into EU domestic legislation and is responsible for the implementation and the further development of the EU's internal policy framework for LULUCF. We work in close collaboration with Member States in the Council and the Climate Change Committee. Main areas of responsibility:  The national expert will work in the team on forestry and land use issues. The focus would be on providing input – through internal briefings and reporting – to the implementation of the LULUCF decision, as well as on the design of future policy initiatives through which the mitigation contribution of the land use sector domestically and internationally can be enhanced. The national expert would be involved in the preparatory work and discussions with Member States about LULUCF (e.g. in the context of the Working Group of the Climate Change Committee), forward-looking climate aspects related to the land use sector in the context of the 2030 climate and energy package, and discussions about the further mainstreaming of climate action into the EU's Common Agricultural Policy. In early 2014 scrutinising the draft rural development programmes of Member States from a climate point of view will be another possible task.

1 Nature of the tasks:	A coherent and ambitious European forest-based research area is a primary pillar for the implementation of the EU Forest strategy. Taking into account the increasing multifunctional demands on and expectations of forest resources it is obvious that the implementation of sustainable forest management will be significant challenge for the future. The contribution from research and innovation is key to overcome these challenges. The lack of a comprehensive Forest Information System of Europe prevents an accurate assessment of the state of forest resources at the European level. Global studies such as the FAO Global Forest Resources Assessment, or European assessments such as the "State of Europe's Forests" provide a compendium of the main characteristics of European forests at national level; however, the lack of detail of this information is often not enough for the integrated assessment of forest environmental services. Although the work on harmonization of information from national forest inventories has been on-going for a number of years, the level of harmonization on this information is still limited. Recently, the Commission proposed to the Member States the development of a Forest Information System of Europe in a modular manner, following its first developments the recommendations provided by the SFC ad-hoc working group on Forest Information. The Council recognized the need for adequate information to identify threats to forests and challenges and shortcomings of existing policies and instruments at national and EU level. It also underlined the need for the continuous assessment and monitoring of the state, dynamics and evolution of European forests, highlighting the role of National Forest Inventory Systems and pan-European initiatives. By implementing a common information system future forest information work will help to improve the level of forest protection and the contribution of forests to environmental and economic objectives, including biodiversity conservation as well as efficient use of the EU's resources. The development and pre-operational testing on a modular approach requires the setting up of a multi-competence JRC team of
